U.S. Pat. No. 5,913,348 describes a production of pulp for use in the manufacture of paper and board by a method wherein a papermaking fiber batt is formed by direct impregnation of the fiber batt with aqueous polymeric binder and thereafter the batt is mechanically dried. In accordance with the method of the aforesaid patent the fibrous batt is impregnated with aqueous polymeric binder containing a mixture of PVA and silica sols. By selecting the mixing ratios of the PVA and the silica sols and by varying the concentration of the sols in the binder in a rather narrow range, it is possible to precipitate two different silicon compounds from solution. These silicon compounds are referred to as phase-separated SiO₂ and fibrillated SiO₂. When paper is manufactured from the fiber batts of the aforesaid patent, phase-separated SiO₂ bonds directly to the cellulosic fibers in the fiber batt resulting in paper having undesirable properties including reduced tensile strength. The reason for this bonded SiO₂ is that the silica sols employed in the process of the patent are used in excess such that a certain amount of the phase-separated SiO₂ cannot be precipitated. Upon curing the bonded SiO₂ may therefore remain in the paper. In order to obviate this problem one could increase the concentration of the phase-separated SiO₂ in the aqueous polymeric binder; however, such practice has other undesired consequences. The reason is that increased amounts of phase-separated SiO₂ causes increased amounts of the silica sols to be precipitated in the form of fibrillated SiO₂ which are only loosely interlinked by the phase-separated SiO₂. Moreover, the fibrillated SiO₂ precipitated in amounts too high prevent the precipitation of the phase-separated SiO₂. In order to achieve a silicon content in the paper which is sufficient for the
